
Administrative Officer (Human Resources)

The Better Public Services Transformation Strategy 2030 positions the Civil Service to deliver a modern, high-performing and future focused public service, with a strong emphasis on building the workforce of the future. In recent years, the Civil Service has significantly strengthened the HR function through a sustained focus on professionalisation, in partnership with the Chartered Institute of Personnel and Development (CIPD), ensuring our people practices are aligned with international standards and best practices. Excellence in human resources is a key requirement in the development of a high performing and engaged workforce. As a result, there is a growing demand for Administrative Officer (HR) roles.

The Administrative Officer (HR) role is designed to provide the link between strategic and operational work of HR units in Departments and offers a unique opportunity to contribute and support the Departmental HR Teams in achieving key organisational objectives through the successful implementation of local HR strategies. Candidates will also benefit from a strong development infrastructure, guided by the Civil Service People Standards Framework, which sets out the capabilities to be successful as a HR professional in the Civil Service. If you are seeking purposeful work, meaningful impact, and the opportunity to be part of a highly skilled and evolving HR profession, the Civil Service offers a compelling and rewarding career.

Successful candidates will play a role in transforming and modernising HR practices in their organisation and across the Civil Service. The Administrative Officer (HR) role may include a focus on areas of:

- Employee Wellbeing and Inclusion
- Talent Management
- Agile Working and Change Enablement
- Strategic Workforce Planning
- Recruitment and Selection
- Learning and Development
- Organisational Design
- Employee Relations and Industrial Relations
- HR Technology and Analytics

The Administrative Officer (HR) may also be responsible for managing relationships with relevant stakeholders, including the NSSO (the Civil Service HR and Payroll Shared Service centre), and overseeing the successful completion of general day-to-day HR activities as required at Departmental level.

Training & Development

The Civil Service is committed to supporting HR professionals to build and sustain rewarding, progressive careers in line with the Civil Service People Standards Framework. A robust Performance Management and Development System (PMDS) is in place to support ongoing performance, growth and career progression. Continuous Professional Development (CPD) is actively encouraged, with access to a wide range of learning and development opportunities, including targeted training programmes and professional courses designed to strengthen capability across the HR function.

In addition, opportunities to engage with the wider professional community are facilitated, ensuring HR professionals remain connected to emerging trends and best practice. This strong focus on structured development and professional growth enables individuals to deepen their expertise, broaden their experience and progress confidently along clearly defined career pathways within the Civil Service HR profession.
